After parking in Piazza Filippo Salvi or in other parking lots in Botta di Sadrina, we set off on foot.

We begin the climb up Via del Giongo, which runs alongside the stream of the same name.

We continue along a paved section reserved for pedestrians.

On our right, we spot "La casa dei ragazzi," a very beautiful building.

On our left, we see a sign explaining the characteristics of the Giongo Valley.

Continuing on, we reach and pass a small wooden crucifix.

At the fork, we continue straight ahead on what is now compact dirt.

The trail narrows slightly, and we pass under an arch of vegetation.

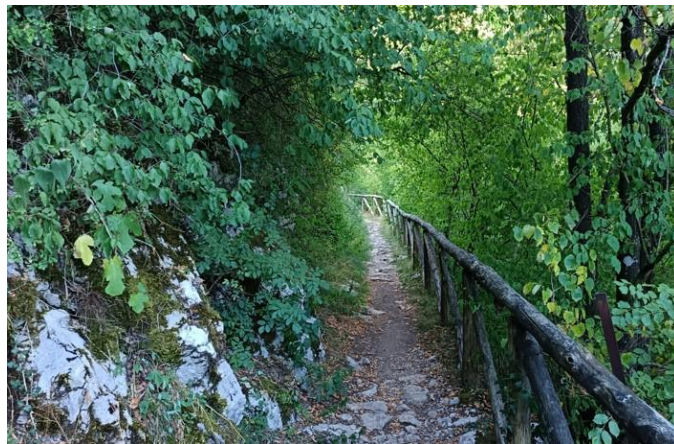

On our right is a wooden bench, perfect for a short break.

Wooden barriers appear on the right, installed to protect against potential falls.

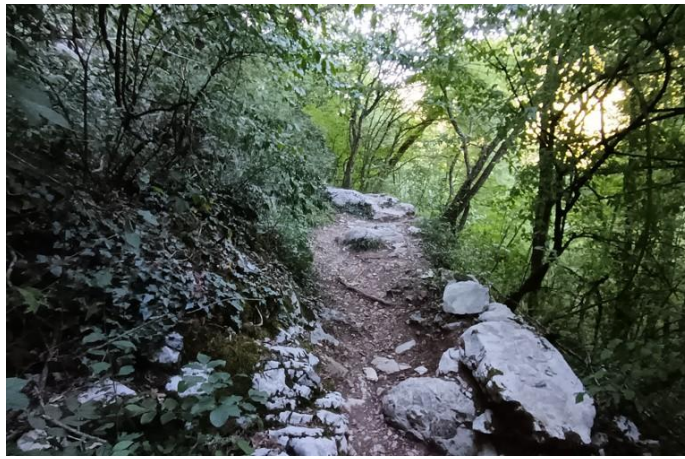

The barrier on the right accompanies us for a good stretch of the trail.

Rocks begin to appear on the trail surface.

On our left, we reach and pass the second rest area.

Now the stones have become boulders that make the path more challenging; we proceed with caution.

The terrain has changed and narrowed further, but the path continues without difficulty.

We reach the second wooden crucifix on our right.

To our left, a large, well-maintained green space comes into view; we continue to the left.

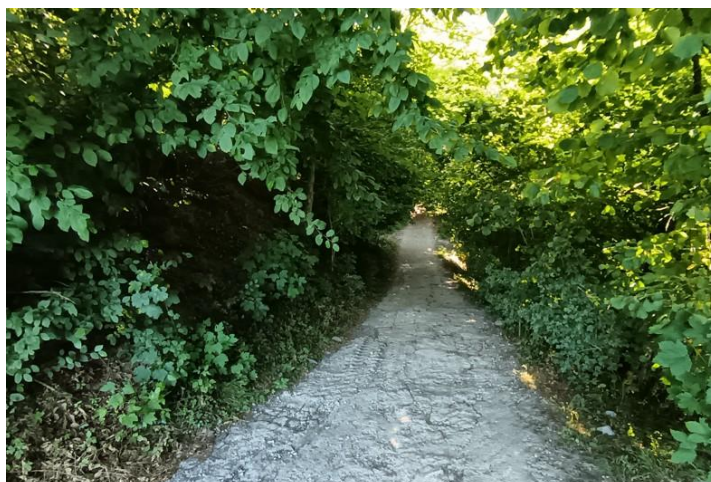

The trail now runs alongside the Giongo stream, and the stones become more numerous.

The water flows slowly to our right as we continue our walk in the cool shade.

We climb up from the stream bed to reach the end of the grassy plateau on our left.

The surface changes from a trail to a concrete agricultural, forestry, and pastoral track.

At the fork, we continue to the left on the compact earthen path.

We reach and cross a ford on a tributary of the Giongo stream.

The road now begins to climb over a concrete and rocky surface.

A signpost informs us that continuing to the right will take us to Bruntino Alto.

We easily cross a second concrete ford.

Now the trail surface consists of compact earth and small pebbles; the path is easy to walk on.

We have reached the small chapel of Bruntino Alto on our left.

After a brief stop, we head back toward Botta di Serina, reading the information on the sign on the left.

Toward the end of the descent, on our right, past the gate, an alternative path branches off; we continue straight ahead.

We reach the meadow we passed on the way there on our right and decide to walk along the small path there.

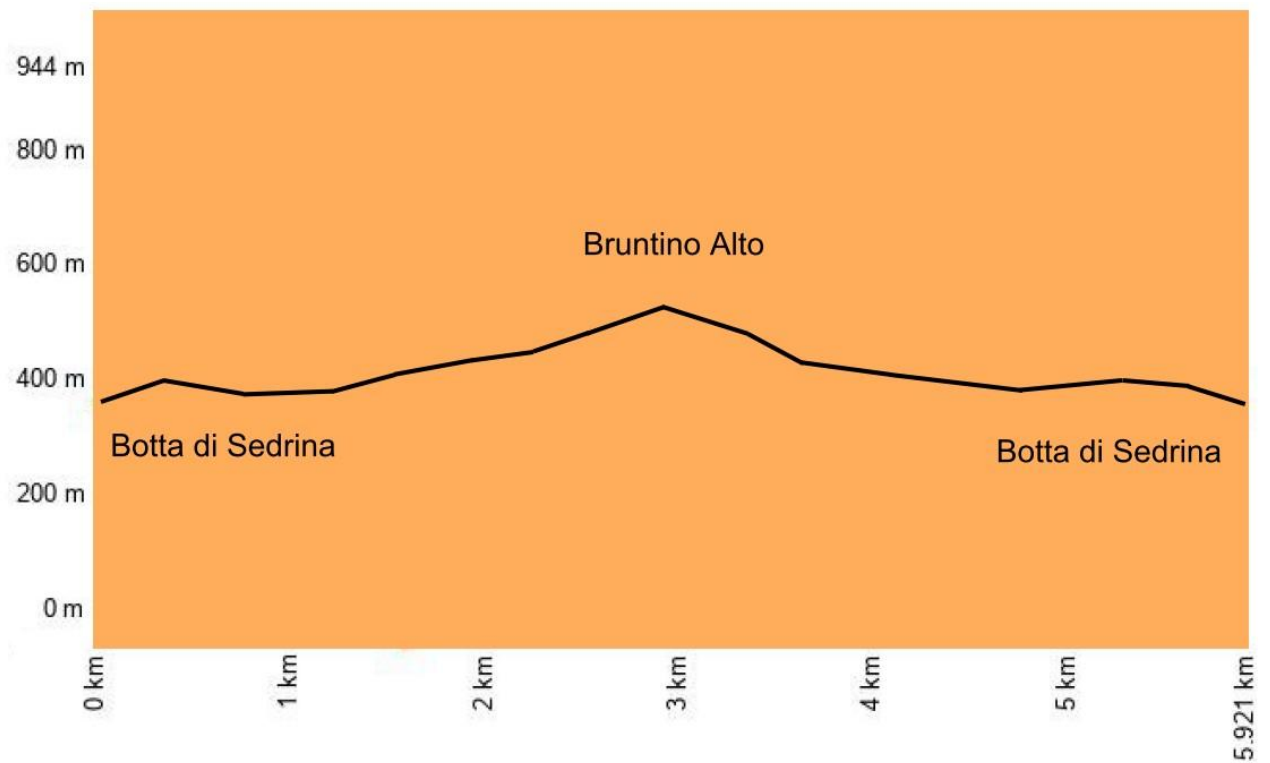

Up close on the right, we can admire the farm, with cows grazing.

At the fork, we keep to the right, using a small wooden staircase, and continue toward the spot where we started this morning.
